Some of the winesses advocated government aid in the erection of dwellings for the poor people who will be driven from the alleys by the proposed legislation, while others declared that these matters could be handled through private means.

Cites President's Interest.

During the course of his testimony Commissioner Siddons referred to the fact that President and Mrs. Wilson have taken a keen interest in the solution of the alley-dwelling problem in Washington.

"One of the most distinguished persons in public life." said Mr. Siddons. "is taking a keen interest in this legislation. I think it is no betrayal of confidence when I say that this is the President of the United States. Both he and Mrs. Wilson have been keenly interested since they came to Washington in the bettering of conditions in the alleys."

Mr. Siddons added that he did not understand that the President was committed particularly to the bill introduced in Congress at the recommendation of the Commissioners.

"It might be possible to find such men, who would be acceptable to all parties, temporarily, but one cannot be sure; one cannot tell what Mexicans may do," admitted Mr. O'Shaugnessy, but he convinced those to whom he said this that he had no personal confidence in such an easy way out of the Mexican turmoil.
